

Lindsey Bailey

Lindsey Bailey attended Ball State University and earned a Bachelor's degree in Psychology. From there, she went on to Indiana University where she earned a Master's degree and Educational Specialist degree in School Psychology. Lindsey practiced as a School Psychologist for 10 years with two special education cooperatives in southern Indiana. As a school psychologist, Lindsey is passionate about supporting students' social emotional needs and collaborating with staff to provide students inclusive environments for learning. Her main area of interest is home-school collaboration with families in low socioeconomic areas.

This school year, Lindsey has transitioned into the role of Director of Special Education for North Lawrence Community schools. The district is in the process of making a big transition out of a special education cooperative and beginning to manage special education services on their own....during a global pandemic! In this new role, Lindsey is responsible for developing new special education policies and procedures. She is also charged with leading the district to implement more progressive practices and service delivery models in special education.

In her free time, Lindsey enjoys gardening, hiking, and boating with her husband and two sons. She is currently pursuing a Director of Exceptional Needs license at Indiana University.
